Basic Psychological Need Satisfaction and Frustration Scale (BPNSNF)

1. Description

1.1 Theoretical background

Within Basic Psychological Need Theory, the satisfaction of the psychological needs for autonomy, competence and relatedness are said to represent essential nutrients of growth (Deci & Ryan, 2000; Ryan & Deci, 2017). To the extent experience a sense of volition and psychological freedom (i.e., autonomy), a sense of effectiveness and mastery (i.e., competence) and a sense of intimacy and connection with important others (i.e., relatedness), their psychological well-being and health should be enhanced. Over the past few years, it has become increasingly clear that the absence of psychological need satisfaction does not by definition imply its frustration (Bartholomew, Ntoumanis, Ryan, Thogersen-Ntoumani, 2011; Ryan & Deci, 2017; Vansteenkiste & Ryan, 2013). Psychological need frustration involves more than the mere deprivation of one's needs. For instance, although an employee may not feel a strong bond with his coworkers on a particular day, this does not necessarily imply he feels isolated and excluded, being indicative of relatedness frustration. Similarly, although a child may at school not feel particularly interested and volitionally engaged in a learning task, it does not imply the child is acting against its own will, with the latter being indicative of autonomy need frustration. Finally, an athlete may struggle with effectively carrying out a new technique and experience little competence, but that does not mean the athlete would by definition feel like a failure. Note though that the presence of need frustration does imply low need satisfaction (Vansteenkiste & Ryan, 2013). That is, when individuals feel isolated, pressured and conflict and as a failure, their psychological needs will not be satisfied. Given this asymmetrical relation between need satisfaction and need frustration (Vansteenkiste & Ryan, 2013), a moderate negative relationship between both can be theoretically expected.

To capture both the satisfaction and the frustration component, a new scale, that is, the Basic Psychological Need Satisfaction and Frustration Scale (BPNSFS; Chen, Vansteenkiste, et al., 2015), was developed, which includes a balanced combination of satisfaction and frustration items. Various studies (see below) have provided evidence for the distinction between need satisfaction and need frustration. Further, congruent with theorizing, psychological need satisfaction was found to play a critical role in individuals' growth and well-being, whereas need frustration was especially predictive of individuals' problem behavior and psychopathology (Ryan & Deci, 2000; Vansteenkiste & Ryan, 2013).

1.2 Historical overview

The BPNSFS has been successfully used in a number of publications among (a) both Western and non-Western populations, (b) both elementary school children and adults, (c) making use of correlational (either cross-sectional or diary) and experimental designs and (d) studying need dynamics at both the general, domain-specific (e.g., physical education, relationships, training) and situational level (Vallerand, 1997).

In what follows, a historical overview is provided of previous studies that made use of the BPNSFS. The overview is selective because the number of studies making use of the BPNSFS is rapidly growing. A schematic overview of this body of work can be found in Table 1.

- (1) The original scale was formally validated in four culturally diverse samples located across the world, that is, Peru, China, Belgium, and the US (Chen, Vansteenkiste, et al., 2015; Study 2). During item development, we made sure that the items conveyed the same meaning across four languages. Through a series of exploratory and confirmatory factor analyses a broader set of items (i.e., 42 items; see Appendix) was reduced to 24, with each need being assessed via eight items, four of which tapping into need satisfaction and four of which tapping into need frustration. Chen, Vansteenkiste et al. (2015) formally tested whether the items carried a similar meaning via a multi-group CFA, thereby providing evidence for the measurement equivalence of the retained set. Further, while need satisfaction was found to relate primarily to life satisfaction and vitality, need frustration yielded a positive relation with depressive symptoms. These associations appeared robust across the different included nations and were not moderated by individuals' desire to get these needs met neither by the valuation of these needs. Thus, even those who explicitly report not to desire getting their psychological needs met or devalued them all together benefitted from its satisfaction. While the scale was originally developed in four different languages (i.e., Spanish, Chinese, Dutch, and English), the scale has been successfully translated into a variety of other languages (e.g., German, Georgian, Italian, Lithuanian), with several of these translated scales being successfully validated (e.g., Portuguese, Cordeiro et al., 2016; Japanese, Nishimura & Suzuki, 2016).
- (2) Given that other needs have also been proposed in the literature that may impact on individuals' well-being, Chen, Van Assche, Vansteenkiste, Soenens and Beyers (2015) examined the unique contribution of the three SDT-based needs in the prediction of well-being after taking into account individuals' level of experienced physical safety. That is, in a sample of poor Chinese migrant workers suffering from financial insecurity and in a sample of South-African students suffering from environmental insecurity, they found the satisfaction of the psychological needs for autonomy, competence, and relatedness to be uniquely associated with individuals' well-being above and beyond the contribution of security/safety. Moreover, the effects of psychological need satisfaction were not moderated by individuals' experienced security, suggesting that even those who feel physically unsafe benefit from psychological need satisfaction.
- (3) Moving beyond well-being as an outcome, Campbell, Vansteenkiste et al. (2015) demonstrated in a Dutch- convenience sample of adults that need satisfaction contributed positively to better day time functioning and better sleep quality over the past month. Need satisfaction could also account for the salutary effect of mindfulness on sleep quality and the detrimental effect of financial worries on sleep quality.
- (4) Haerens, Aelterman, Vansteenkiste, Soenens, and Van Petegem (2015) validated the first domain-specific measure of the scale in the context of physical education (PE) in a sample of Dutch speaking adolescents. They found that whereas perceived autonomy-supportive teaching was conducive to autonomous motivation for PE through experiences of need satisfaction, perceived controlling teaching related to controlled motivation and amotivation for PE through experiences of need frustration. Thus, much like Campbell et al. (2015), they provided evidence for the explanatory (i.e., mediating) role of need satisfaction and need frustration, this time between the perceived social environment and motivational outcomes.
- (5) Because the BPNSFS was originally used among university students and adults, Van der Kaap-Deeder, Vansteenkiste, Soenens, Loey, Mabbe, and Gargurevich (2015) developed a more simplified version of the scale and provided evidence for the validity of the scale in a much younger sample. Specifically, in a sample elementary school-age children, they found that the mother-child similarity in experienced need satisfaction could be explained by the extent to which children perceived their mothers to be autonomy-supportive (although this was only the case for the younger siblings). To the extent that children themselves experienced greater need satisfaction, they were more likely to adopt an autonomy-supportive approach towards their siblings, suggesting that dynamics of need satisfaction may promote adaptive interactions among family members. In the context of this study, a more simplified version of the BPNSNF was used such that children could also fill out the measure. The reliability of a composite score of need satisfaction appears to be satisfying.

- (6) Using an experimental design, Van Petegem, Soenens, Vansteenkiste, and Beyers (2015; Study 4) showed that adolescents who read a hypothetical vignette, in which the parents formulated a specific request in a controlling, neutral, or autonomy-supportive way, experienced more autonomy need frustration, which, in turn, elicited more state reactance. Van Petegem, Zimmer-Gembeck et al. (2017) built on this work by making use of a state measure that tapped into the satisfaction versus frustration of all three psychological needs. These studies thus provided evidence for the assessment of need satisfaction and frustration at the situational (instead of the domain or general) level.
- (7) Further, collecting data in a sample of pregnant women, Brenning, Soenens, and Vansteenkiste (2015) reported that need satisfaction versus frustration related to better relational satisfaction and vitality as well as less depressive symptoms.
- (8) Next, Aelterman, Vansteenkiste, Van Keer, and Haerens (2016) showed that need satisfaction plays an energizing role in promoting teachers' shift in physical education teacher beliefs during a training. That is, to the extent teacher felt their psychological needs got satisfied during the teacher training, they became increasingly convinced that the offered autonomy-supportive and structuring strategies were feasible and effective, two beliefs which predicted their intentions to apply the offered strategies. Need satisfaction also yielded a direct positive contribution to the intention to teach in a more autonomy-supportive and structuring way above and beyond the change in held beliefs. This study provided evidence for the validity of need satisfaction at the situational level, as the items assessed PE tapped into experiences of need satisfaction and need frustration .
- (9) Vanhee, Lemmens and Verhofstadt (2016) adapted the BPNSFS to yet another context, that is, romantic realtions. They showed that both need satisfaction and frustration contributed to relationship satisfaction in individuals who were involved in a committed heterosexual relationship. Need satisfaction appeared to be the strongest predictor for relationship satisfaction for both men and women.
- (10) In a subsequent series of studies, the BPNSFS was adapted to a diary format. Specifically, in two series of diary studies, the day-to-day variation in need satisfaction and associated parenting practices were examined, both in a sample of parents (Mabbe, Soenens, Vansteenkiste, Van der Kaap-Deeder, & Mouratidis, 2018) as well as elementary school children (Van der Kaap-Deeder, Vansteenkiste, Soenens, & Mabbe, 2017). Specifically, Mabbe et al. (2018) reported that daily variation in parents' experienced need satisfaction and need frustration related to changes in daily variation in, respectively, autonomy-supportive and psychologically controlling parenting. Van der Kaap-Deeder, Vansteenkiste, Soenens, and Mabbe (2017) found that daily variation in experienced teacher, sibling, and parent autonomy support related primarily to daily variation in children's need satisfaction and well-being, while daily variation in experienced teacher, sibling, and parent psychological control related primarily to daily variation in children's need frustration and ill-being. In these studies, a shortened 12-item version of the BPNSFS was used.

- (11) Continuing the diary research program, Kindt, Vansteenkiste, Loeys, and Goubert (2016) examined the daily variation in relationship-based (instead of general) need satisfaction and frustration in a sample of chronic pain couples. In this study, a shortened 6-item version of the BPNSFS was used and adapted for a relational context. They found that partners' autonomous motives for providing help related to improvements in partners and patients' affective, relational and help-specific functioning, which was accounted for by improvements in partners and patients' daily relationship-based need satisfaction.
- (12) Campbell, Vansteenkiste, Beyers and Soenens (2018) adopted for the first time a longitudinal design to study shifts in need satisfaction and need frustration as adolescents entered and moved out of a stressful period (i.e., exams). They found that need frustration peaked during exams, while need satisfaction was most elevated during the post-exam period. Moreover, changes in need satisfaction and need frustration across time related to changes in perceived stress, which, in turn, related to changes in sleep quantity, sleep quality and daytime dysfunctioning.
- (13) Interestingly, an adapted version of the BPNSFS was developed and tested in a group of adults with mild to borderline intellectual disability (MBID). Results indicated an adequate factorial structure of the BPNSFS-ID, comprising the satisfaction and frustration of each of the three needs (Frielink, Schuengel, & Embregts, 2016).
- (14) Finally, Campbell, Vansteenkiste et al. (2019) provided evidence for the critical role of need-based experiences among HIV-patients. Elevated need frustration was predictive of poorer sleep, which, in turn, could (partially) account for the salutary role of need satisfaction in the prediction of physical and mental well-being.

2. Use

2.1. Order

The items tapping into the six facets of need satisfaction and frustration can best be mixed. Some of versions in this document already present the items in a mixed order, but when this is not the case, it is recommended to mix the items.

2.2. Scoring procedures

The different subscales of the BPNSFS can be used in different ways. Both empirical and theoretical arguments can be considered to decide upon which scales to use. First, some scholars have limited themselves to using a composite score contrasting need satisfaction and need frustration in a single index (e.g., Brenning et al., 2015; Campbell et al., 2015; Van der Kaap-Deeder et al., 2015). Second, to shed light on the unique contribution of need satisfaction and need frustration, composite scores of both have been created and they have been inserted as unique predictors of individuals' motivational functioning and well-being (e.g., Haerens et al., 2015; Kindt et al., 2016). Third, on other occasions, scholars were interested in examining the unique contribution of all three needs and, as a result, they created composite scores for autonomy, competence, and relatedness, thereby combining the need satisfaction and reversed need frustration items of each separate need (e.g., Chen, Van Assche et al., 2015). Finally, some authors have combined two or more of these approaches, thereby proceeding in a stepwise fashion. For instance, after having demonstrated the critical role of overall need frustration and overall need satisfaction for, respectively, ill-being and well-being (cfr. Option 2), they proceeded by looking at the unique contribution of the separate need frustrations in the prediction of ill-being and of the separate need satisfactions in the prediction of well-being (Chen, Vansteenkiste et al., 2015). Overall, we suggest that a combination of theoretical and empirical arguments may lead one to choose the one method above the other.

2.3. Adaptations and contact persons

Several adaptations are available and these adaptations have in most cases been subjected to rigorous validity and reliability testing. Specifically, the following adaptations are now available of the original scale, as published in Chen, Vansteenkiste et al. (2015):

- (a) Language: the scale is available in Dutch, English, Chinese, Spanish, Portuguese, Japanese, French, Italian, Portuguese, Turkish, Hebrew, and German.
- (b) Age: both a child and an adolescent/adult version is available
- (c) Domain: the scale has been adapted to the domains of physical education, romantic relationships, and training.
- (d) Clinical status: the scale has been used among adults with intellectual disabilities, chronic pain patients, and individuals diagnosed with HIV.

To streamline the referencing to these various adaptations, the abbreviation 'BPNSFS' can be followed by a specification of the adaptations, such as 'BPNSFS-general', 'BPNSFS-physical education' and 'BPNSFS-diary'.

With regard to the different translations of the general scale, we encourage scholars to first contact the contact person of this translated version before employing the scale. Information concerning the contact person for each translation can be found in the table below.

2.4. Terms of use

Academic use. Scholars are free to use the scales that are presented in this document. If you wish to adapt the scale to a specific situation or translate the scale in your own language, we would like to be informed on this (please e-mail to Jolene.Deeder@ugent.be and Maarten.Vansteenkiste@ugent.be) such that we can possibly help out and further update this document as new versions get developed and tested. We only plan to add new adaptations of the scale to this document on a moment a formal document (i.e., a manuscript) is written up. Yet, it may well be the case that we have already a particular language version or adaptation available that you may be looking for. Additionally, if you have further questions about a specific version of the scale, you can contact the contact person of that version (see Table 2). If you are unable to reach this contact person, you can send an e-mail to Maarten.Vansteenkiste@ugent.be.

Commercial use. The scale can not be used for commercial purposes without formal, written permission of the authors. In case you do consider using the scale for commercial purposes, you need to contact Maarten.Vansteenkiste@ugent.be.

3.1.1.1. Adults

Hieronder willen we meten welke specifieke gevoelens je momenteel ervaart. Je kan een score toekennen van 1 ('helemaal niet akkoord') tot 5 ('helemaal akkoord') om aan te geven in welke mate een bepaald gevoel op dit moment van je leven van toepassing is.

	1	2	3	4	5
	Helemaal niet waar				Helemaal waar
1. Ik heb een gevoel van keuze en vrijheid in de dingen die ik onderneem.	1	2	3	4	5
2. De meeste dingen die ik doe voelen aan alsof 'het moet'.	1	2	3	4	5
3. Ik voel dat de mensen waar ik om geef, ook geven om mij.	1	2	3	4	5
4. Ik voel me uitgesloten uit de groep waar ik bij wil horen.	1	2	3	4	5
5. Ik heb er vertrouwen in dat ik dingen goed kan doen.	1	2	3	4	5
